Luxor

Have fun when you visit Luxor. For the Islamic conquest of Egypt, the Arabs called Luxor, a city on the eastern bank of the Nile 670 kilometers south of Cairo, for its numerous palaces. A true gold mine of Egyptian antiquities, despite its small size (about 5 km from north to south and 1.5 km from east to west). Along both sides of the Nile, Luxor is home to several Pharaonic temples, most of which are made of sandstone, and a wealth of Egyptian artifacts.

Flying to Luxor is different. It's a city of many descriptions. A visitor might consider it a uniquely great site, or a museum that has actually scored some of the world's most famous hits. However, at the same time, it's difficult to reduce the experience to a visit to this tourist center that connects to many other global cities. Luxor is a city that transcends the manifestations of daily popular life that characterize prominent cities in the Arab Republic of Egypt, where it has defined popular culture, diverse industries, and traditional medicine. Luxor has embraced modern simplicity with a mosaic that combines various ancient sects with the appearance of life. Its ancient buildings on both the eastern and western banks of the Nile River have become a living entity that blends with the other elements surrounding it.

A visitor's experience exploring the ancient city of Luxor would not be complete without taking a hot air balloon trip. For about an hour, rent a seat in a hot air balloon with other people and take in the amazing aerial perspective of the entire city below, free from any obstacles. Luxor appears as a series of pieces arranged side by side from this balloon, creating an unmatched "big shot" that encompasses the city's many attractions, including the people, the rocks, and the Nile.
