The temple served as a house of worship and continues to do so now. But throughout the ages, it has changed in a number of ways. During the Christian era, the hypostyle hall was transformed into a Christian church, and the church's ruins may still be seen today. After then, it was transformed into a mosque, which has been conserved alongside artifacts and remnants of the old temple.

A row of seven pairs of 16-meter-tall papyrus columns stood at the northern end of the temple, which served as an entryway in ancient times. Inside the temple, there is a hall with 32 other columns, in addition to a small hall, a waiting room, a birth room, and the Church of Alexander the Great at its rear. Spatial and chronological evidence of the Pharaonic culture across the millennia may be found in abundance at Luxor. The Luxor Temple is the most significant of its numerous structures.

The tombs in the Valley of the Kings and Queens, the Karnak Temples, the Luxor City Museum, funerary temples, the nobles' tombs, and other enduring structures. Joining guides to archaeological sites, chatting with groups of tourists at each attraction, taking pictures of the most significant artifacts and temples, buying souvenirs and small carved statues, and watching light and sound displays in the city's museums are just a few of the activities available to visitors to these locations.

Explore the Draa Abu el-Naga area, where you may see and absorb the most recent discoveries that the Egyptian archaeology team is now examining. In 2017, the tomb of the god Amun's goldsmith, Amenemhat, was discovered... In a room within were two sculptures of him, his wife Amunhotep, and their son Nebnefer. Mummies, wooden masks, colorful wooden coffins, over a hundred Ushabti figurines, and a little Ushabti figure with gold flakes were discovered within.

Take pleasure in a trip to Habu. The temples that Ramses III saw while fighting in ancient Syria served as the model for Habu's construction. It was built on 10 acres and was 400 meters long by 200 meters broad. He said that because of the enormous gate known as the Magdal on its outer wall, which is around 17.7 meters high and has two walls—one internal and one external—one of the biggest and most significant fortified temples in ancient Egypt is the Temple of Habu. The temple's walls are covered in many artworks that recount the conflicts. There are many drawings on the walls of the temple that tell the stories of the wars of King Ramses III and stories about the military campaigns he led from Egypt and the enemies he defeated.
